NO MATTER WHAT YOUR PASSION—TENNIS, SKIING, GOLF OR grandchildren—heavy use of joints and muscles can cause wear and injury that limit your ability to do what you love. Fortunately, such problems are treatable, and the Leni and Peter W. May Department of Orthopaedics at Mount Sinai School of Medicine is recognized as the last-stop destination for some of the toughest orthopaedic problems. Patients rest assured knowing that surgeons who excel in their individual field will look over each and every case, and collaborate as necessary to ensure that all needs are met.

“Mount Sinai has a talented group of highly skilled surgeons who bring the latest cutting-edge techniques in arthroscopic surgery, joint replacement, sports medicine procedures, spinal surgery, shoulder and knee reconstruction, hand surgery and foot and ankle procedures,” says Department Chair and Lasker Professor Dr. Evan Flatow.

The physicians of Mount Sinai Orthopaedics Faculty Practice are committed to the treatment and prevention of physical handicaps in all patients, the furthering of orthopaedic knowledge through research, and the teaching of medical students and orthopaedic residents. As part of the research, Faculty Practice physicians have led the way in innovations in their respective fields—from developing new approaches for joint replacement to pioneering means of cartilage restoration.

The department of orthopaedics at Mount Sinai School of Medicine extends congratulations to the nine physicians who were named to the 2010 Super Doctors list. They include Drs. Flatow, Bronson, Gladstone, Grelsamer, Hausman, Hecht, Levy, Parsons and Wittig.
